^A jennet or jennah (جنة) ¹ Paradise, heaven. Mahomet knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high a regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Alcoran, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Mahomet upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Mahometans believe that there are eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice.
^A abli jennet The inhabitants of paradise.
jennet mekan Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes).
^A jenneti aden The garden of Eden. The Mahometans assign three places for this terrestrial paradise: The first, near Damascus in Syria; the second, towards Obollah in the Arabian Irac or Chaldea; and the third, on a spot bordering upon the desert of Noubendijan in Persia, called Sheb Bouvan, watered by the Nilab; whilst others fix it at Samarcand. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Serendib or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam.

du or diru A devil, demon, genius, giant, spirit, ghost, hobgoblin. The soul or breath of man. A black mushroom, or fungus. A leach, a blood-sucker.

Possessed by the devil, a demoniac. diu ban The devil's wind, a whirlwind, hurricane, monsoon. The Dives, geni, or giants, in Eastern mythology, are a race of malignant beings, called likewise Diru ner, male demons, (the Peris being imagined of the female sex, though both are supposed to propagate their species independent of one another, an irreconcilable enmity subsisting between them, See پری). The Persians say, that four of the principal geni made war upon Tahmuras, the third king of the Pish-dadian dynasty, by whom however they were defeated, and imprisoned in frightful caverns; on which account that prince is called in history and romance Diu bend, the chainer of demons. In the Chronicle of Abujasar, there is a tradition, that God created the Genii or Dives long before Adam, and gave them the world to rule over for 7000 years: after which, the sovereignty was vested in the Peris and Dives for 2000 years more, under their sole monarch Gian ben Gian: but these beings disobeying the mandates of God, Eblis (the devil) then an ethereal angel, was sent from heaven to chastise and govern them; when, being joined by a considerable party of malecontents, he gave battle to Gian ben Gian, whom he totally routed, and became in his room absolute sovereign of the earth. Intoxicated however with his dignity, Eblis forgot that he was inferior to Omnipotence: to humble him therefore Man was created, and the proud angel commanded to obey him; but refusing, he was cursed by God, and doomed to everlasting torment. From this stubborn disobedience, it is added, he was named Iba, The Refractory; Eblis, The Desperate; and Sheitan, The Proud: his original name having been Hares The Guardian or Protector.

- ¹ ramazan (pl. ramazanat, or ramazanun) pronounced by the Arabians ramadan, The ninth month of the Mahometan year; during which their prophet has enjoined a fast of the most rigorous kind; all good Moslems being interdicted from eating, drinking, and conjugal duty, from the rising of the sun till the appearance of the stars; the sick, the traveller, the soldier in the field, and others, whose situation will not permit so strict an observation of it, being obliged to fast a compleat month when their health and circumstances will allow. The word Ramazan implies a consuming fire; whence it is by some conjectured, that this month was formerly stationary in the most sultry period of the summer, and not revolving through all the seasons, as at present, in consequence of the Mahometan year being universally lunar. The Ramazan is greatly revered on many accounts, but particularly from the belief, that it was on the 27th of this month called ليلة القدر (the night of power) that the Alcoran began to descend from heaven; on the anniversary of which all orthodox Mahometans continue most fervently in prayer, imagining that every petition then put up to Omnipotence will be favourably received. Ramazan is also ¹ One of the attributes of God, as the pardoner, and likewise the burner of sinners. ² Sand shining, or scorched by the reflection of the sun.

⁹ reml ¹ Sand, especially a particular kind of it used in Geomancy, called by the Arabians ylm u'l'reml, The science of the sand. Upon this sand (for which paper is however sometimes substituted) they draw many unequal lines, upon which are disposed a certain number of points; from the combinations of which, they pretend to foretel future events. Some orientals attribute this invention to the Antediluvian patriarch Enoch; (see ادريس); some to the prophet Daniel; some to Cham, the son of Noah; and others to the Egyptian Hermes, or Trismegistus. It is in great credit in the east, many elaborate treatises having been written on the subject. ² Making mats, or

^P سال sal (pl. سالان, سالها) ¹ A year. سال شمسي The solar year. سال قمری (سال در سال or سال بسال) The lunar year. From year to year, every year. سال آینده (سال ديگر) The next year, the year to come. سال قحط A year barren for want of rain.—The epoch of the Persian solar year is of very high antiquity, their historians and astronomers generally carrying it up to Gem or Gemshid (p. 694.) above 800 years before the Christian era. It consists of twelve months, of thirty days each, five days more being added to a particular month to make the number in all 365. For some time there was no embolism, similar to our leap year; in consequence of which, their Nauruz, or new year's day (p. 940.), originally fixed at the vernal equinox when the sun enters Aries, unavoidably made a retrograde progression into Pisces; to remedy which, at the end of every 120 years, a month was intercalated, and celebrated with the greatest festivity all over the kingdom. This month, at the end of the first period, followed Phervardin (March); at the second celebration it was placed after Ardibe-

biht (April); and on the third, it succeeded Kbur- dad (May); the five asciticious days being always annexed to it. In this rotation, it continued till the year 636 of the Christian era, when Yezdeghird, III. the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, being defeated and dethroned by the Ara-bians, Persia became a province of the great empire of the Khalifs; and the Mahometan lunar computation being introduced in all civil and religious affairs, the intercalations of the solar year were, from that period, neglected, till 1079, when the Selju-kian sultan of Persia, Malekshah Jellaleddin (Emiru'l Omra (p. 239) to the khalif Moktadi) reformed the kalendar, which has since borne his name; bringing forward the Nauruz from the fifteenth degree of Pisces to the first of Aries, and intercalating an embolismal day every fourth year, which was thence called سال کبیسه or leap-year. The astronomers, in their tables, add the five asciticious days to the last month Isfendarmaz (February); though they are vulgarly annexed to Aban (October), because they happened to follow that month, in the intercalary rotation, at the defeat of Yezdeghird, who had made an alteration in the Kalendar, known by his name, which however, in consequence of that event, soon ceased to be publicly attended to. It may here be observed, that the old Persian month was not divided into weeks, every day having a distinct name taken from the angel supposed to preside over it. See ماه

^P Sikender ^{سکندر} Alexander. Two princes of this name are much celebrated in the East, (both distinguished by the title of ^{زوالقرنین} Zu al-Qarnayn), implying that they conquered the globe from east to west; the first supposed to be one of their most ancient kings (see ^{سیرالذهب} Sir al-Zahab); the other Alexander of Macedon, whom they call also Ben Filicos (son of Philip), and Roumi (the Grecian). Some Persian historians say, however, that he was not the son

- of Philip, but of Darab (Darius), who having married a daughter of Philip, sent her back, tho' pregnant, because he disliked her breath; that being delivered of Alexander at her father's court, Philip educated him as his son, and bequeathing him his crown with the secret of his birth, he laid claim to the throne of Persia, then filled by his younger brother Darius (by another mother), and supporting his pretensions with a powerful army, defeated him, and reigned as the tenth king of the Caianian dynasty; dividing his empire on his death-bed amongst twenty-four of his principal commanders, the chief of whom they call Lagos (Ptolemy). The Tarikh Montekheb relates, however, that he distributed his dominions in his life-time among the sons of those princes whom he had conquered, on the condition of their paying him homage as lord paramount, and furnishing certain quotas of troops; which terms they punctually complied with till his death, when each became independent in his feudal principality. (If there are circumstances in these Eastern details inconsistent with truth, let it be remembered, that they are not more visionary than the legendary improbable fictions, which swell the Greek historians). The conquests of Alexander are celebrated in many Persian, Arabick, and Turkish histories, romances and poems, under the titles of Sikender namé (the Book of Alexander), Aineh Iskenderi (the mirror of Alexander), Beharistan (the mansion of the Spring), &c.

600 rupee, of full standard weight.—There is a degree of magnificence in some of the Eastern coins, together with an elegance of fancy in the inscriptions, to which the Europeans have nothing similar. A mere accident having afforded me an opportunity some time ago of making a hasty transcript of one (struck at Delhi, A. D. 1653, in the reign of the Great Mogul Shah Jehan), which to me appeared to give weight to the above observation, I shall here insert a description of it, as it may to some perhaps be an object both of curiosity and information: It is of gold and circular, above 70 ounces in weight, nearly four inches diameter, and four lines thick; in value about 300l. Within the circle on each side is inscribed a square, (the angles in contact with the periphery) in which, and in the complementary segments, are the following inscriptions.

(1. Within the square on one side)

شهاب الدین محمد صاحب قرآن ثانی شاه جهان پادشاه غازی

The bright star of religion, Mohammud, a second Saheb Keran, Shah Jehan, the victorious emperor. (Saheb Keran is a royal title, similar to Cesar, Augustus, &c. It was adopted by Tamerlane).

(2. In the segment of the circle, on the upper side of the square)

سکه بر مهر دو صد مہری زن از لطف اله
The impression upon this coin, of 200 mohurs, (see مهر) was struck by divine favour.

(3. On the lateral segment to the left hand)

ثانی صاحب قرآن شاه جهان دین پناه
by the second Saheb Keran, Shah Jehan, the defender of the faith.

(4. On the bottom segment)

روی زرباد از نقش سکه اش عالم نور
May the face of gold, from the sculpture of this coin, enlighten the world,

(5. On the lateral segment to the right)

تا شود از پرتو خورشید روشن روی ماه
as the splendid face of the moon is (illuminated) by the rays of the sun.

On the Exergue or Reverse.

(1. Within the square)

لا اله الا الله محمد رسول الله—ضرب ۱۰۶۴
دار الخلافه شاه جهان آباد

There is no God, but God, and Mahomet is the prophet of God. Struck in the palace of Shah-jehanabad (Delhi) A. H. 1064 (A. D. 1653.)

(2. On the top of the square)

شد ایان از صدق ابی بکر انور
Religion was enlightened by the truth of Abubekre;

(3. On the left hand compartment)

شد از عدل عمر اسلام قوی دست
The faith was strengthened by the justice of Omar;

(4. On the bottom compartment)

از شرم و حیای عثمان دین تازه شد
Piety was refreshed by the mildness and modesty of Othman;

(5. On the right hand compartment).

ولایت انور در علم علی یافت

The world was illumined by the learning of Ali.

—————No name is more famous in the east than Solomon: he succeeded his father David, according to their belief, when only twelve years old; at which age, however, Omnipotence placed under his obedience not only mankind, and animals, but even the elements, and the Genii, good and bad. His throne was magnificent beyond idea, 12000 seats of gold being arranged on the right for the patriarchs and prophets, and 12000 on the left for men learned in every science. The birds were his constant attendants, screening him like a canopy from the inclemencies of the weather; whilst the zephyrs, wafting him wherever he wished to go, rendered horses or any earthly carriage unnecessary. —————All the wonderful traditions however relative to Solomon, it must be observed, are not confined to the son of David. The heroic or fabulous ages of the Persians go far beyond those of the Europeans; the world, agreeably to their system, being peopled thousands of years before Adam, by ethereal original beings, governed, by a succession of seventy-two Solomons. The supernatural powers supposed to be vested in those Antedemite monarchs, as well as in the king of Judah, are figured to have been chiefly derived from the curious talismans they were said to have possessed, (to which allusions are often made not only in their poems and romances, but even in their graver works, and in the Alcoran itself) as the Khatym, or Mubur Solimani, the seal of Solomon; the Tigh atesh, or the flaming sword; the Jebeh, or the impenetrable cuirass; and the Seper or the shield; which last they add was bequeathed by Jan ben Jan, one of the Antedemite kings, to the father of mankind, who carried it to Serendib (Ceylon), where it was many ages afterwards discovered by Caiumaras, the first king of Persia; from whom descending to his grandson Thahmuras, it was by that prince employed so successfully in his wars with the Dives, that he got the surname of Div bend, or chainer of demons. See دامبال — جان بن جان — ديو — پري &c. These, it may be said, are Persian tales; but let us not ridicule them; they are dignified by the Homer of Persia, Ferdusi, in his Solomon name, as the mythology of the ancients was rendered important by the Homer of Greece. Every age and every nation have their fooleries; many received opinions even of modern times will not bear the touchstone of truth; and the forcery laws of our own country are a far more authentick disgrace to human nature than all the wild yet pleasing fictions of the east.

♠ Seba or suba 'The zephyr, a gentle gale; a refreshing wind (generally blowing from the east at the equinox). ♠ Youth, youthful ardor or love.

♠ Sebaa 'Rising (a star). ♠ Coming forth (a tooth, nail, &c.) ♠ Watching the motions or rushing upon (an enemy). ♠ Changing one's religion, i. e. apostatizing from Mahometism, and becoming a Sabeian. This is one of the most ancient religions we have any traces of, being supposed to be that which prevailed in Persia, previous to the reign of Kishtasp (Darius Hystapes); when it gave way to that of the Magi, then introduced by Zerdust or Zoroaster. (See مغ). They believed in one God, and in the ministry of angels, or inferior deities, as represented by the stars, which became in consequence high objects of their adoration. They held many tenets in common with the Mahometan, the Magian, the Jewish, and even the Christian religion, being by travellers called Christians of St. John, because they adopted a species of baptism. Their chief pilgrimages were to Haran in Mesopotamia, to Mecca, and to the pyramids of Egypt, which they supposed to be the tombs of Seth, and his sons Enoch and Sabi, whom they considered as the founders of their faith. This was the principal religion of the Arabians before Moslemism, and is one of those tolerated by the Alcoran on paying a certain tribute to the prophet and his successors.

⁵ Large smooth stones. Sofy or sefi The surname of a dynasty of Persian kings (who reigned from about the year 1500 till the usurpation of Nadir Shah in 1736) so named from Ismael Sefi, the first monarch of this house. The origin of the elevation of this family however must be traced to a private ancestor of that prince, called Sefé'd'din (the purity of religion), who was cotemporary with Tamerlane. He resided at Ardebil, in Media; where his reputation for virtue was so high, that he was visited by that conqueror, as Diogenes was formerly by Alexander. Tamerlane on this occasion was so charmed with his conversation, that desiring him to ask any thing in his power to grant, the sage pointed to a number of young Carmanian captives, (whom this scourge of mankind according to custom meant to sacrifice) on the first publick festivity, and requested their liberty: they were immediately delivered to him as slaves; but the generous philosopher furnishing them with every thing necessary, sent them free to their native country. As they were of the first families in Carmania, their sense of his benevolence found no bounds; they were constant in their attentions, and magnificent in their gifts; a respect little short of adoration was paid to him; and it was chiefly owing at length to the attachment and courage of the descendants of those grateful Carmanians that his posterity mounted the Persian throne.

vering the retreat of the young Feridun, placed him on the throne; in return for which, that prince gave him, as a feudal principality, Isfahan, with the surrounding districts (known afterwards by the name of Parthia, now Persian Irak). The blacksmith's apron became from that period the great standard of Persia being from him named Direfsh Gavani, (the banner of Gao). By Feridun and succeeding princes; it was richly ornamented with jewels, and lodged in the royal treasury; whence it was never carried to the field but when the king marched in person. It is said to have fallen at length into the hands of the Arabians, who found it amongst the other spoils of Yezdegird, the last king of the Sassanian dynasty, who was defeated by Saad, general to the khalif Omar in the year 636 of our era. See سال—Feridun is the boast of the Persians, as a model of every virtue; but his reign is so much disguised by fable, that, without placing confidence in the facts, we must only consider them as objects of popular belief. Khondemir, an historian of character, and the Tarikh Cazideh, gravely give him a reign of above five hundred years, which alone justly renders much of the rest suspected. The same length of reign is assigned to this prince, in a book of Persian Cosmogony called Bohun Dehesb, written in the Pehlevi or old Persick, and ascribed, by the Parsis of Guzerat, to be one of the works of Zoroastre; tho' part of it, at least, from allusions to particular events, must have been written since the seventh century of our era. Zoroastre is said to be one of his descendants.

the civil power to take cognizance of their conduct. The men they treat with little regard to politeness; but to the ladies they behave with infinite gallantry; the course of their pilgrimage being in general marked by a decisive cure of all female sterility: the former therefore, for the most part, abandon the villages on their approach; but the women, in seeming amazement at the terror of their male friends, undauntedly face this formidable host. The prayers of the Fakeers are then solicited with much eagerness, and they are too holy to deny comfort to their fair devotees: on these occasions however a flipper or a staff is always left as a signal at the door, which effectually convinces the husband, should any blunder unluckily direct him homeward, that his intrusion would be unpardonable, and subject him to a chastisement he seldom cares to hazard. — It is astonishing, at the same time, what tremendous voluntary penances these people impose upon themselves, to gain a superior influence over the people: Some suspend themselves by the shoulder blades to iron hooks; some stand from the rising till the setting of the sun, like statues on their pedestals, exposed in that sultry climate to all the influence of his scorching rays; some clench their fists till the nails, piercing their palms, appear through the back; some load themselves with chains; some gash themselves with knives; some hold their arms constantly perpendicular; whilst others twist their heads till they look directly backward. Every invention, in a word, of perverted ingenuity is exhausted in distorting and deforming nature; some, of the most elevated enthusiasm, striking off even their own heads, on great solemnities, as a sacrifice to the Ganges, which they worship: if the nerves of the self-devoted victim are powerful enough to dismember it completely, he unquestionably goes to heaven; if not, his former sanctity is questioned, and his future happiness remains a doubt. — The Fakeers and dervises in Arabia and Persia wear coarse woollen garments.

^ ka-yet A high, extensive mountain. ^ The top of a hill.

^ Kaf A fabulous mountain, anciently imagined by the Asiatics to surround the world, and to bound the horizon on all sides. In their writings, therefore, to paint the rising of the sun, they say, "When the star of day appeared from the height of Kaf the world was enlightened:" whilst they express the whole extent of the earth, by, "از قاف تا قاف" From Kaf to Kaf." To account for the first or false twilight (called الفجر الكاذب), which is followed by an intense darkness immediately before dawn (named الفجر الصادق or الفجر الثاني), the Eastern astronomers supposed a window in Kaf, some degrees below the summit, thro which the sun's rays being conveyed as he rose, the world after he had passed was left in temporary obscurity till he appeared again above the horizon. Since, however, some of their philosophers have applied themselves to the study of geography, they have discovered Kaf to be Mount Caucasus, or Imaus, to the east, and Mount Atlas, to the west; over which the sun, in those countries, appears to pass when he rises and sets. In the Alcoran (for even Mahomet was carried along by this popular belief) Kaf is said to rest upon a stone, called Sakhrat, formed, according to some learned doctors, of one entire emerald, the reflection from which, they say, gives the azure appearance to the sky; whilst its movements produce earthquakes, volcanoes, and all the extraordinary phenomena of nature. On Kaf the Eastern poets and romances have fixed the residence of the Dives or Genii, (supposing them to have been here confined by Tahmuras, and other ancient heroes of Persia): here too, they say, lies Fairy land; and here they place the city of Aherman (the principle of evil), where Argenk, a Genie king, they add, built a splendid palace, in a gallery of which, were portraits of the different kinds of rational beings who inhabited the globe before Adam. See سليمان — اهرمان — عنه — ركايل بن ادم — پري — ديو &c.

See امان کاغدی or دین کاغدی—† قهار A safe conduct.—The Eastern nations are very curious in their paper, both in their books and in their letters; the most scrupulous etiquette being observed, when addressing great men, to send them precisely that sort of paper which custom has annexed to their rank. To the king, the ground upon which they write is gold; to subahs, and feudatory princes, it is generally ornamented with flowers of gold and other decorations; descending thus, through inferior ranks, with a variety of gradations, both in quality and size, till it becomes either quite plain, or is powdered slightly with gold dust. A great man may be flattered by sending him a paper superior to his dignity; but to err in the other extreme, is considered as an insult which he will not easily forgive. Kaghyz implies likewise a patent, presented by the kings of Persia to those whom they mean to honour; by virtue of which, the governors of every district, thro' which a Kaghyzdar travels, must supply him, the moment he presents it, with carriages and every necessary, to which his rank is intitled.

¹ کاو or کاه Gao The famous blacksmith of Ispahan who defeated the usurper Zohak (see نبردون). The Caherman name assigns the following fabulous origin of this insurrection. The devil had long been subservient to Zohak, and at last, as a reward for all his services, desired only to kiss his shoulders; when immediately two serpents fastened on the spots where the demon had fixed his lips, and fed incessantly upon his flesh; the devil then told him, that the only alleviation of torment he could find would be the application every day of the brains of two men to the afflicted parts. The gaols were in consequence soon emptied, and the innocent then as well as guilty were daily dragged to death; till the sons of Gao having at length fallen victims to the tyrant's disease, the blacksmith flew to arms, and, seconded by the universal voice and power of the people, attacked and destroyed him. Khondemir, without taking notice of the devil, confirms the tale; and adds, that the gaolers, moved with compassion for their unhappy prisoners thus doomed to feed the tyrant's distemper, allowed many to escape, supplying the demand with the brains of sheep; and that from those fugitives, who took refuge in the Ararat or Gordian mountains of Armenia, sprung the nation known since by the name of Kurds. The great Cyrus, he adds, was a lineal descendant of Gao.
